German engineers favored word processing software

Connectivity is the key for efficient technical documentation

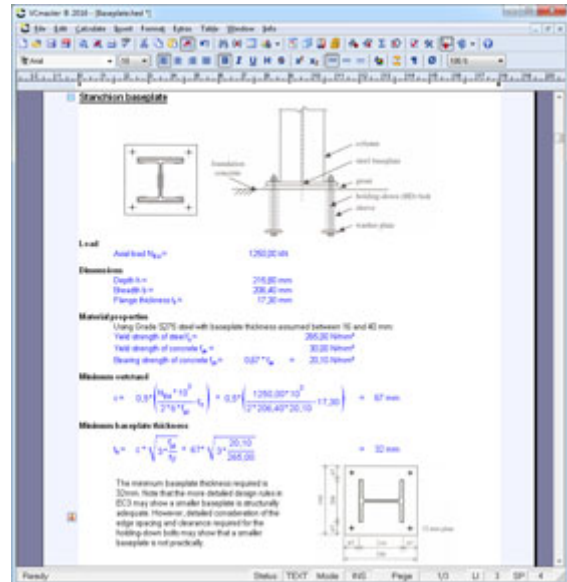

With its leading-edge software VCmaster, Veit Christoph GmbH, a software developer specializing in computer programs for engineers, offers a software-application that is capable of compiling uniform and continuous documents from numerous different software-sources and data. The unique t2W-interface integrated into VCmaster ensures the data transfer from various external software applications allowing a seamless unification of texts, graphics, sketches, tables as well as specialist software and specific information; for example manufacturing guidelines. With the help of its innovative t2W-interface the software's cross-product concept allows for the implementation of all software categories, by merging different data types into one single document - with the benefit of a uniform appearance. This ingenious concept closes a crucial gap in technical digital documentation.

"VCmaster brings together all collected information in one single place, allowing for efficient organization of all planning processes. Accuracy, currency and availability of all this data is an essential part of commercial success." states Veit Christoph, founder and CEO of Veit Christoph GmbH.

Comments or calculations can be added to the new documents without any difficulties due to VCmaster's inventive approach. This results in a consistent document, complete with page numbering, uniform headers and footers, table of contents, PDF export and much more.

"With VCmaster engineers and technicians have software at their disposal that creates cutting-edge technical documentation with limitless options." says Veit Christoph.
